What would the flak be like ahead, en route to the target? Would skimming a 5-ton bomb along a reservoir knock down a huge dam? Then the Navigators radioed the fateful words “Enemy coast ahead Skipper” and the throttles opened wider to spread the three aircraft further apart to make it harder for German flak to concentrate on a single target.

Last week I was doing some shopping and paused to look at a stall of second hand books being sold for charity. There was a copy of Enemy Coast Ahead by Wing Commander Guy Gibson VC (I know he had other decorations - DFC?) so I picked it up. I have to get round to reading it, but in the front there is a sobering list of Pilots (and their crews) who were missing from raids he had flown in.
